"I DON'T BELIEVE IT"

By R. H. WILKINSON

GUS WILLIAMS has a habit when one is telling a story, of saying, "I don't believe it."

Gus doesn't mean anything by it. He doesn't intend to be rude or contrary.

It is just an expression which comes unthinkingly and forgetfully to his lips, and he has adopted and injected into his casual conversations.

Gus says, "I don't believe it," quite in the same tone and manner as one who is telling a story.

But despite the fact that all the above statements are true, Gus "I don't believe it" is a source of annoyance and exasperation to his friends.

Whoever the listener is, Gus is sure to say, "I don't believe it," and he will say it in a way that is sure to annoy.

One reason for this is, because they have so little to do, and they have so little to do, and they have so little to do.

They have so little to do, and they have so little to do, and they have so little to do.

They have so little to do, and they have so little to do, and they have so little to do.

They have so little to do, and they have so little to do, and they have so little to do.

They have so little to do, and they have so little to do, and they have so little to do.

They have so little to do, and they have so little to do, and they have so little to do.

They have so little to do, and they have so little to do, and they have so little to do.

They have so little to do, and they have so little to do, and they have so little to do.

They have so little to do, and they have so little to do, and they have so little to do.

They have so little to do, and they have so little to do, and they have so little to do.

They have so little to do, and they have so little to do, and they have so little to do.

They have so little to do, and they have so little to do, and they have so little to do.

They have so little to do, and they have so little to do, and they have so little to do.

They have so little to do, and they have so little to do, and they have so little to do.

They have so little to do, and they have so little to do, and they have so little to do.

They have so little to do, and they have so little to do, and they have so little to do.

They have so little to do, and they have so little to do, and they have so little to do.

They have so little to do
